Knock down textured ceiling pictures

Photo: istockphoto.comSmnockdown plaster finish, an early 1990s successor to popcorn and orange peel textures, has been a hit with homeowners for its impressive look and practicality. The appearance is achieved by spraying, kicking or rolling the plaster joint compound on walls or ceilings to achieve stallaactitt-like tops, and then flatten the tops with a knockdown knife. The resulting marbled, naturalistic texture provides dimensional visual impact while concealing any surface flaws. As a bonus, the treatment helps to mute sounds. Another part of the appeal? DIYers armed with basic plaster skills and some affordable tools and materials can create the look with ease! Read on for an overview of knockdown texture technique, plus step-by-step guidance on pulling off the most popular type of this finish, to achieve a knockout effect in your home. Photo: flickr.com via bradleyjohnsonThree Types of textureThere are three main types of knockdown texture splatter, stomp and mud trowel- each with a distinct appearance and requires unique tools and techniques. Splatter: The most popular knockdown texture, splatter has the classic look of Spanish lace stack - an intricate pattern of splotches inspired by lace veils. It is achieved by first spraying the surface using a plaster container gun (available at home centers; about $13 for half a day rental) loaded with either pre-mixed wet gypsum mud or common compound powder mixed with water. The tops that form are then flattened with an 18-inch or wider knockdown knife ($15 to $20) to achieve a low-profile raised texture covering 40 percent of the surface (the other 60 percent remain flat). The application can be a little messy, especially when spraying a roof (due to descending splashback). And because a plaster hopper gun is needed, this technique requires more initial setup time than stomp and mud trowel, but when you are good at walking the program will turn out to be fast, uniform, and less tiring. You can splash a small surface in as little as an hour or complete a larger area in about a day. Stomp: The most prominent textured appearance of the three, the stomp has a higher height of the surface than splatter or mud trowel. It is created by thin pre-mixed or ready to mix gypsum sludge with water and then apply it to a wall or ceiling using a paint roller. Then a stiff bristly crow-foot brush ($8 to $20) is trampled into the mud, and finally the mud is flattened with a standard knockdown knife, leaving a finger-like texture of 60 percent or more of the surface. Because plaster is initially applied by the roller to fully cover the surface, and an additional step of stomping is required before knockdown, the whole process can take about twice as long as splatter. Mud trowel: Also called ship trowel, this technique gives a flatter, more subtle look than splatter or stomp. It is achieved to use plaster mud using an 18-inch or wider curved leaf plaster trowel ($25 to then skimming mudded the area again with cleaned trowel). The curved trowel causes the mud to literally jump over the wall or ceiling, leaving a sparse texture of round, quarter-sized globules at 50 percent of the surface. Hand-stranded requires patience, making this technique more time consuming than splatter. While our instructions include info on mixing plaster joint compound powder, you can skip step 4 and use pre-mixed wet plaster mud just as well. TOOLS AND MATERIALS Available on Amazon – Tarpaulin – Masking Tape – Spackling compound – Fine-gravel sandpaper (150-gravel or higher) – Gypsum retains gun kit – Air hose – Air compressor (minimum capacity of 30 to 40 40psi) – 1.5-gallon joint compound powder (not fast dry) – 6-inch plaster knife – 2-gallon bucket – Power drill with paddle attachment – Scrap of plaster (for testing) – 18-inch knockdown knife – RagsSTEP 1 : Prepare the space. Clear furniture from the room and put tarpaulin on the floor. Remove wall-mounted light analists and hanging and apply masking tape on electric covers, baseboards and wall or ceiling beams to protect against overspray. STEP 2: Smooth the surface. Knockdown texture can be applied either naked or painted plaster as long as the surface is blem so- To prepare the surface, don protective gloves and glasses and apply the spackling compound to divots or cracks. Wipe the compound according to the instructions in the package, then sand with fine gravel sandpaper. STEP 3: Assemble the gun. Attach the container (pool) to the top of the plaster container gun, then attach the gun unit and air tubing to the air compressor. Attach the spray nozzle to the gun – an 8 to 12-millimeter nozzle is ideal for impact trips. STEP 4: Mix the plaster joint. Choose an un-aggregated plaster joint compound powder (avoid quick varieties, which dry too fast for the knockdown technique). Fill a two-gallon bucket with two inches of plain cold or room temperature water, then add 1.5 liters of plaster joint compound powder and mix using a power drill with a paddle attachment (see example of Amazon) until the mud is lumpless. STEP 5: Test the mud. Scoop up a small amount of mud with a small plaster knife, then tilt the knife to a 30-degree angle. If the mud glides off easily, it has reached the right thin consistency; if not, add more water, mix and test again. Let the mud sit for 15 minutes to absorb the water completely. Then lightly stir with the drill bit again. When your mud is the consistency of pancake batter, pour it into the container. Photo: istockphoto.comSTEP 6: Choose optimal spray speed. Connect the air compressor to an earthed socket, open the air vent and turn on the compressor, and set the pressure to 30 to 40 psi. on a sheet of scrap plaster from at least 18 inches away, using a smooth, continuous movement. When you test, you can settle on a spray speed that gives the texture weight you want. The slower you spray, the heavier and more pronounced texture; a quick spray will result in a thinner, lighter texture. STEP 7: Splatter the surface. Once you've perfected your technique, squeeze the trigger on the plaster container gun to splash the intended wall or ceiling into three foot sections from a distance of about 18 inches away. Tip: Enable the gun release lock function to be continuously sprayed without having to manually maintain the pressure on the trigger. STEP 8: Do knockdown. Let each three-foot section dry just long enough to lose its wet shine - about 10 to 15 minutes. Attach the impact knife to an extension rod and then slide the edge in a single straight line down the surface. Your goal is to just flatten the tops of the wall texture, not smooth it out so much as to erase it. Wipe the edge of the plaster knife with a water-soaked rag. STEP 9: Alternate splatter and knockdown. Repeat this process, alternating between using mud and turning down the texture, into three-foot sections until you have covered the intended area. When finished, close the compressor air vent, turn off and disconnect the unit. STEP 10: Allow to dry and finish. Allow the gypsum sludge to dry completely according to the manufacturer's instructions, ranging from a few hours to overnight, before removing the masking tape and tarpaulin and returning wall seals and light fixtures. If you plan to paint knockdown texture, wait several days to a week after primer and paint. Keep Knockdown looking nice! Dust the surface weekly with either an electrostatic duster or a vacuum with a soft brush accessory. Never use abrasive scrub brushes or broom heads, which can remove the texture. To remove the dirt and stains, saturate a paint roller with a solution of a teaspoon of liquid dish soap and four cups of warm water. Carefully walk over the dirty areas, then use a clean, damp roller to remove soap solution residues and make a final pass with a dry roll or soft sponge. Gypsum compound can take on smoke and soot stains over time, so avoid smoking and limit the frequency of fires near textured surfaces.
